Foremost, I owe a debt of gratitude to my two supervisors, Dr. Ian Burkitt and Professor Phil Thomas. Their expert guidance, generosity of time and unwavering enthusiasm both sustained and encouraged me during the research process. Thanks are also extended to Dr. Clive Baldwin and Professor Gail Hornstein for sharing their expertise in narrative research, and Dr. Paul Sullivan for clarifying my thinking on Bakhtin. Sara Maitland gave much needed specialist knowledge in the complex area of saints, mysticism and madness and my thoughts on these areas would have been impoverished without her input. Finally thanks to my family, Richard, Tom and Joe, who unknowingly reminded me of what was important. This thesis is dedicated to my twin baby boys who died in May 2003. Their short lives made me realise the importance of stories and their place in recovery and healing.

This research was supported by a bursary from the School of Health Studies at the University of Bradford.
