
The University of Bradford Institutional Repository

<http://bradscholars.brad.ac.uk>

This work is made available online in accordance with publisher policies. Please refer to the repository record for this item and our Policy Document available from the repository home page for further information.

To see the final version of this work please visit the publisher's website. Available access to the published online version may require a subscription.

Link to original published version: <http://dx.doi.org/10.1177/1742715015621372>

Citation: Ford J and Harding N (2016) Followers in leadership theory: Fiction, fantasy and illusion. Leadership. Published online before print: <http://dx.doi.org/10.1177/1742715015621372>

Copyright statement: © 2016 SAGE. Reproduced in accordance with the publisher's self-archiving policy.

Followers in Leadership Theory: Fiction, Fantasy and Illusion

Journal:	Leadership
Manuscript ID	LEA-15-0041.R2
Manuscript Type:	Standard Article
Keywords:	leadership, follower/ship, critical leadership studies, power, transformational leadership, distributed leadership, servant leadership, implicit follower theory
Abstract:	This paper introduces a critical approach to follower/ship studies through exploring the unarticulated but highly influential implicit academic theory of follower/ship that informs dominant paradigms of leadership. Research into follower/ship is developing apace but the field lacks a critical account. Such an absence of critical voice renders researchers unaware of the performative effect of their studies, that is, how their studies actively constitute that of which they speak. So, do studies of followers (and leaders, it follows) constitute that very actuality they are studying? Analysis of seminal papers in three major categories of leadership, leader-centric, multiple leadership and leader-centred, shows that leadership theory is underpinned by the desire for power and control over the potentially dangerous masses, now labelled 'followers'. The etiolated perspective of the people called 'followers' undermines leadership theory, and we recommend the wisdom of leaving follower/ship unexplored.

SCHOLARONE™
Manuscripts

Followers in Leadership Theory:

Fiction, Fantasy and Illusion

Abstract

This paper introduces a critical approach to follower/ship studies through exploring the unarticulated but highly influential implicit academic theory of follower/ship that informs dominant paradigms of leadership. Research into follower/ship is developing apace but the field lacks a critical account. Such an absence of critical voice renders researchers unaware of the performative effect of their studies, that is, how their studies actively constitute that of which they speak. So, do studies of followers (and leaders, it follows) constitute that very actuality they are studying? Analysis of seminal papers in three major categories of leadership, leader-centric, multiple leadership and leader-centred, shows that leadership theory is underpinned by the desire for power and control over the potentially dangerous masses, now labelled 'followers'. The etiolated perspective of the people called 'followers' undermines leadership theory, and we recommend the wisdom of leaving follower/ship unexplored.

Key words: Leadership, followers, critical leadership studies, power, transformational, distributed, servant leadership, implicit follower theory

Followers in Leadership Theory:

Fiction, Fantasy and Illusion

Introduction

The vast body of literature on leadership has until recently largely ignored followers, an omission that has now been recognised, leading to an emergent body of work, follower/ship studies. However, it would be wrong to suggest that leadership studies has been awaiting follower/ship studies' provision of its missing half. Rather, leadership studies is built on an implicit academic theory of followership, one that continues to inform the vast bulk of work in leadership studies. Implicit followership theory is defined as 'individuals' personal assumptions about the traits and behaviors that characterize followers' (Sy, 2010:74). These are 'lay' or 'naïve' theories, but are believed to influence relationships in practice, because leaders are understood to compare followers to the fantasy of an ideal(ised) follower that exists only in their minds, and judge the follower against this impossible model, blinding themselves to how that person actually behaves. Our aim in this paper is to disinter the implicit academic theory of follower/ship through a close reading of seminal texts in three influential theories of leadership: transformational, distributed, and servant leadership. This leads us to argue that leadership theory's unexamined core undoes the leadership theory that is built around it, and to conclude that this is a good thing. We thus bring a critical approach to the emerging field of follower/ship studies that it has previously lacked.

Followers and followership: an absent presence

A huge number of publications on leadership appear each year. Indeed, Grint (2005) identified (in Late October 2003) 14,139 items relating to 'Leadership' on Amazon.co.uk for sale and just two months later this had risen to 14,610. On this basis, he predicted 100,000 items by 2015. Whilst this huge figure was difficult to conceive at the time, the reality was grossly under-estimated, as a similar search conducted by us on 1st October 2015 actually listed 146,704 results – thus showing more than a tenfold increase in the twelve-year period. This vast body of literature pays considerable attention to leadership styles, behaviours, competences and mind-sets, and to how leaders look, what they believe in, their identities, and so on. This research is predominantly located in a positivist tradition in which quantitative research methods are preferred (Bryman, 2004; Zoller & Fairhurst, 2007). Followers appear in these studies, if they do, only as part of the very large sample populations that are asked to complete questionnaires in which they rate leader influence and effectiveness according to a list of pre-determined characteristics. That is, they participate as the passive and faceless 'other' to the leader (Bligh, 2011; Ciulla, 1998; Ford and Collinson, 2009; Jackson and Parry, 2011). While some, such as Hollander (1992; 1998) contend that this form of leadership research is replete with an understanding of followers, others argue that it demonstrates a general lack of interest; indeed Uhl-Bien and Pillai (2007) argue that the term 'follower' has almost pejorative implications, with followers seen as passive, helpless, conforming individuals, with little or no drive or aspiration until they are persuaded out of their sloth by the leader, and therefore, it would seem, lacking any merit as research subjects.

1
2
3 But a follower-centric approach to leadership studies is now emerging (Shamir et al, 4 2007) and a body of theory is developing that, like leadership studies more generally, is
5 located in a unitarist perspective that assumes leaders and followers serve a common
6 purpose (Challeff, 1998), and thus should morally elevate each other (Ciulla, 1998). One
7 of the earliest contributors to follower/ship studies was Burns (1978) who argued leaders
8 could improve their relations with followers through developing ‘a relationship of mutual
9 stimulation and elevation that converts followers into leaders and may convert leaders
10 into moral agents’ (Burns, 1978: 4). The major influence on the field is Meindl (1995)
11 who critiqued the tendency of leadership scholars to place their faith in the heroic,
12 transcendental leader who could achieve almost impossible organizational feats
13 irrespective of contextual, social or environmental factors. He argued that this ‘romance
14 of leadership’ ignored one half of the leader/follower dyad, that is, ‘Leadership is 15 considered to have emerged when followers construct their experiences in terms of 16 leadership concepts’ (Meindl, 1995:332). His work opened the door to a body of research 17 that argues (a) charisma does not emanate from a leader but emerges in the minds of 18 followers who see the leader as charismatic; (b) it is interactions between followers that 19 influence how a leader is regarded, and (c) context is important. This follower-centred
20 approach (Shamir et al, 2007) presumes a symbiotic relationship between leaders and 21 followers that is held together by trust and loyalty and rooted in the leader’s commitment 22 to ethical standards.
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49

50
51 Meindl’s paper (1995) led to the rise of largely quantitative studies by leadership 52 psychologists, and several taxonomies of follower/ship have been developed that 53 summarise this research. Bligh and Knowles (2008) for example, identified three broad 54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 categories: (i) follower attributes that are pertinent to the leadership process, including 4 such constructs as perceptions, identity, affect, motivations and values; (ii) leader-
5
6 follower relations including the active role played by followers on the leadership
7
8 dynamic; and (iii) follower outcomes of leadership behaviour, including performance, 9
10 creativity or other dependent variables and effects that leaders have on followers. In the 11
12 same year, Howell and Mendez (2008) identified three role orientations of followership:
13
14 interactive (in which followers complement and support the leader); independent (in 15
16 which there may be followers who substitute for leaders in contexts of highly skilled and 17
18 knowledgeable followers) and shifting (which reflects alternating leader/follower roles).
19
20 Stech (2008) meanwhile outlined another three approaches to the study of leaders and 21
22 followers: (i) the traditional approach of the leader/follower paradigm which focuses on 23
24 the leader as hero or exemplar; (ii) the leader-follower position paradigm which 25
26 emphasizes the formal, hierarchical and bureaucratic organization in which leaders are 27
28 defined by their position in the hierarchy; and (iii) the leader-follower state in which 29
30 leadership and followership are states or conditions that can be occupied at various times 31
32 by different people. In their analysis of the literature on followership, Crossman and 33
34 Crossman's (2011: 484) slightly broader categorization identifies four broad overlapping 35
36 classifications of leadership and followership literature within a fluid continuum: (i)
37
38 individualized or leader-centric theories that ignore the significance of followers in the 39
40 leadership context; (ii) leader-centred theories which rely on follower perspectives; (iii)
41
42 multiple leadership which encompasses what is often referred to as shared, distributed or 43
44 collective leadership and which privileges the role of followers, and (iv) the followership 45
46 literature per se. Their paper focuses on explorations of leadership and followership in 47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 relation to each other, identifying that a “comprehensive review of followership literature
4 (Baker, 2007: 56) made use of Heller and van Til’s (1982) summation that: ‘leadership
5 and followership are best seen as roles in relation’, a view which is also endorsed by 6
7
8
9
10 Kelley (1998). Hollander and Webb (1955), too, provided an early definition of 11
12 followership but drew attention to the difficulty of defining the term given that it might 13
14 vary depending upon whether followership was approached from the perspective of a 15
16 leader or a follower” (Crossman and Crossman, 2011, p.483). Our approach is located 17
18 within the recently labelled Critical Leadership Studies perspectives, which has been 19
20 defined as ‘the broad, diverse and heterogeneous perspectives that share a concern to 21
22 critique the power relations and identity constructions through which leadership 23
24 dynamics are often produced, frequently rationalised, sometimes resisted and 25
26 occasionally transformed’ (Collinson, 2011, p.181). We seek to develop a critique that 27
28 draws on the identity constructions through which leadership (and followership) are 29
30 brought into being.
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38

39 There is thus increasing interest in followers and followership (see, for a discussion, 40
41 Riggio, Chaleff and Lipman-Blumen, 2008; and Shamir et al’s [2007] tribute to Meindl).
42
43 A review of the research that has been influenced by Meindl’s ideas by Bligh, Kohles and 44
45 Pillai (2011) concludes that these studies challenge some of the basic assumptions of 46
47 leadership theory. That is, firstly, charisma is attributed post hoc to leaders after success
48
49 has been achieved; and secondly, merely being given the title of leader persuades 50
51 followers to perceive that person differently. That is, ‘followers’ psychological readiness 52
53 to comprehend events in terms of leadership may play an important role’ in determining 54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 how leaders are regarded (Bligh, Kohles and Pillai, 2011, p. 1067) and indeed they
4 suggest it is now established that followers play ‘an active role in the leadership process’
5
6 (1068).
7
8
9

10
11
12 Such a conclusion accounts for the development of a theory of the social construction of 13 followership. This is defined by Shondrik and Lord (2010:9), as: 14
15
16

17
18
19 ‘the emergence of a leadership relationship that occurs when (1) a potential leader 20 perceives or infers a group of individuals to be his or her followers or (2) when 21 individuals in a group begin to view themselves as members of a larger group led 22 by a leader. Rather than being confined to the role of a passive participant under 23 the control of a leader, followers are able to actively construct and shape the 24 leader’s perceptions and their self-perceptions through interactions with the leader
25 and each other’.
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38

39 Meindl’s influence is clear here. His 1995 paper’s title was ‘The romance of leadership as 40 a follower-centric theory: A social constructionist approach’. Carsten et al’s (2010) study
41 is perhaps exemplary of the research stimulated by Meindl’s introduction of a social 42 constructionist perspective on followership. Carsten et al explored individual 43 ‘followership schemas’ or ‘generalised knowledge structures that develop over time
44 through socialization and interaction with stimuli relative to leadership and followership’
45 (p. 546). They identified three categories of followers: passive, active and proactive.
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60
Passive followers emphasised deference and obedience, active followers emphasise

1
2
3 partnership, while proactive followers emphasise constructive challenge and voice. Only 4
5 passive followers appeared to feel comfortable working with authoritarian leaders.
6
7

8
9 However, the critical perspective that often informs social constructionist accounts 10
11 (Gergen, 1985; 1991; 1998; 1999; Shotter, 1991; Shotter and Gergen, 1989) is largely 12
13 absent from the social construction of followership, which ignores power, an issue we 14
15 will return to below. Such an absence of critical writing is also noted in another area of 16
17 followership studies: that of implicit leadership and followership theories (see Bligh, 18
19 Kohles and Pillai, 2011, for a discussion). Implicit followership theory is defined as 20
21 ‘individuals’ personal assumptions about the traits and behaviors that characterize 22
23 followers’ (Sy, 2010:74). These are ‘lay’ or ‘naïve’ theories, but are believed to influence 24
25 relationships in practice, because leaders are understood to compare followers to an 26
27 ideal(ised) follower that exists in their minds, and treat the follower accordingly, 28
29 regardless of how that person actually behaves. Implicit leadership theory explores 30
31 leaders’ and followers’ unspoken assumptions about leadership. Studies into these 32
33 unspoken, unarticulated theories of what sort of person a leader or follower is are not 34
35 very complimentary to followers. De Vries and van Gelder (2005), for example, point 36
37 out that leaders are generally valorised but followers are demonised. Such demonization 38
39 of followers can be illustrated from the change management literature in which some 40
41 theorists write about resistance to change in terms that characterise followers as having a 42
43 lack of psychological resilience, preference for low levels of stimulation and novelty, 44
45 short-term thinking, cognitive rigidity and reluctance to give up old habits (Oreg, 2003).
46
47 Such a stance implies that those who do not like change are suffering from personal 48
49 shortcomings, rather than their perhaps having the wisdom and knowledge to anticipate 50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 some problems that changes might cause. It further infers that all wisdom and receptivity
4 to change resides in the leader whose qualities, by implication, include resilience,
5 flexibility, innovative thinking, and high levels of stimulation. These implicit theories are 6 understood to influence interactions in organizations, often negatively (Sy, 2010),
7 although others see them as constituting ‘a dynamic leadership process’ in which 8 leadership is understood as ‘an ongoing, dynamic, two-way exchange between leaders
9 and followers that is structured by both parties’ implicit theories’ (Shondrik, Dinh and 10 Lord, 2010:1). However, there is little or no reflexivity in this work, so the researchers do 11 not explore their own implicit theories, and there has been no attempt to explore the 12 implicit academic followership theory that informs research and theorising in this field.
13 The task of this paper is to identify the implicit followership theory that informs 14 academic debate.

15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34 In sum, research into followership is developing fast, but the field lacks a critical account.
35 This absence renders researchers unaware of the performative effect of their studies. This 36 goes beyond the semantic issue that bedevils followership studies identified by Bligh 37 (2011:432), who suggests that the word ‘follower’ has connotations of subordination and 38 passivity, and ignores possibilities for understanding people identified as followers as 39 active, self-motivated, influential and involved. Bligh argues that alternative words 40 (participants, contributors, members, associates, collaborators) are perhaps needed. We 41 go further. A performative understanding of language (Butler, 1990, 1993) whereby 42 discourses are understood as constituting that of which they speak, suggests that by 43 asking study participants to think or talk about themselves as followers (or leaders), 44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 researchers are actively positioning participants within an identity category or subject
4
5 position that limits what they can do or say: they have to constitute themselves as 6
7 followers in order to conform with the requirements of the research study. This leads to 8
9 the question of whether research into followers/ship actually constitutes that which it is 10
11 exploring. Does 'the follower' exist as a self-identity until someone is asked to account 12
13 for themselves as a follower? That is, do studies of followers (and leaders, it follows)
14
15 constitute that very actuality they are studying?
16
17
18 19

20
21 These questions are pertinent to Collinson's (2006) poststructuralist questioning of 'the 22
23 notions of voluntary and freely chosen followership that inform much thinking on 24
25 follower identity and followership more generally' (p.182). He suggests that current 26
27 theories of followers and followership ignore the conflicts, ambiguities and tensions that 28
29 may be involved in being called a follower, and are unaware of the multiple ways in 30
31 which it is possible to enact followership and constitute the identity of follower. Although 32
33 Collinson (2006) initially pursues the seemingly common practice of identifying three 34
35 follower identities, he rejects that practice by suggesting that individuals move through 36
37 all three perspectives of: conformist (conforming to a blueprint of the 'ideal' follower), 38
39 resistant (refusing to conform to managerial and leadership demands, or undermining 40
41 them), and dramaturgical (using impression management to give the appearance of being 42
43 a good follower through various tactics). 'Followers' can be all of these, sometimes in the 44
45 same instant. Contrast this with the one-dimensional follower in Kelley's (1992) concept 46
47 of exemplary followers, that is, followers who are active, independent and critical 48
49 thinkers. These followers, he argued, tend to have strong values and to be the courageous 50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 conscience of the organization. Collinson (2006) would suggest that that would be but 4
5 one aspect of their on-going performative accomplishment of the workplace self.
6
7

8
9 We add this possibility of leadership research constituting that which it is exploring to 10
11 Bligh's (2011: 432) list of the major gaps in understanding about leadership/followership:
12
13 there is difficulty in defining leadership and followers/followership; little is known about 14
15 contextual and cultural influences on leadership and followership; researchers have been 16
17 unable to see leadership as anything but romantic, with followers therefore the 18
19 subordinated and inferior party; and the discipline has barely begun to explore the ethical 20
21 implications of leader-follower processes.
22
23

24
25
26 The critical leadership literature, in which we locate this paper, has as yet contributed 27
28 little assessment of the turn to followership. Exceptions include challenges to the 29
30 asymmetrical power relationships and identity constructions through which leadership 31
32 dynamics are reproduced (Collinson, 2011; Ford, Harding and Learmonth, 2008; Harding, 33
34 2015), but also a warning of the dangers of replacing leader-centrism with follower-35
36 centrism or keeping the dualism in place but giving primacy to followers (Bligh, 2011:
37
38 429; Collinson, 2006; 2011; Ford, Harding and Learmonth, 2008; Uhl-Bien and Pillai, 39
40 2007). But Meindl (1995: 340) was mindful of the need to 'remediate leadership studies
41
42 by disentangling, decoupling, or separating leadership from its origins: objectifying it - 43
44 cleaning it up, so to speak - so that researchers can better work with it as a scientific 45
46 construct, independent of its lay meanings'. We share his belief in the need to interrogate 47
48 the origins of leadership theory, or rather the assumptions that have informed thinking 49
50 about leadership since the early days of trait theory (Ford, 2005), even as we reject his 51
52 desire to make followership more scientific. Our argument is that the now-emerging field
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 of follower/ship studies is informed by its unexamined and uncritical heritage, and so it
4
5 threatens to repeat the mistakes of the first century of leadership theory.
6
7

8
9 Our aim in this paper is to identify the unarticulated but highly influential implicit 10
11 academic theory of follower/ship that informs dominant paradigms of leadership. We thus 12
13 introduce a critical approach to follower/ship studies. We analyze seminal papers in each 14
15 of the three major categories of leadership theory identified by Crossman and Crossman's 16
17 (2011) review of the leadership and followership literature. From leader-centric theories 18
19 we explore Bass and Steidlmeier's seminal account of Ethics, Character and Authentic 20
21 Transformational Leadership Behavior (1999); from the multiple leadership category we 22
23 analyse Gronn's (2002) paper on distributed leadership; and from leader-centred theories 24
25 that (apparently) rely on follower perspectives we explore Greenleaf's (1970/1991) essay 26
27 on servant leadership.
28
29
30
31

32 33 Methodology

34
35
36 Our methodology is influenced by Calas and Smircich's (1991) seminal reading of major 37
38 management texts, in that we also adhere to traditional academic practice of close reading 39
40 of texts to identify the verity of their arguments and their unarticulated assumptions. We 41
42 drew on Brown's (2004) method of analyzing documents. This involves a close reading 43
44 of each text to identify and code interesting features, informed by a specifically 45
46 deconstructionist perspective that explores how meaning is constituted and undermined.
47
48
49

50
51 The 'interesting feature' we specifically sought was the understanding of the scene of 52
53 encounter (Butler, 1997) between leader and follower: how is each party, leader and 54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 follower, described, how is the stage set for the encounter, and what is understood to go
4
5 on in this encounter? Following Butler (2000) we asked:

- 6
7
8
9 1. what acts of recognition are taking place?
- 10
11 2. what are the norms and ethical frameworks in which these acts of recognition 12
13 take place?
- 14
15 3. what identities can emerge through these acts of recognition?

16
17
18
19 This gave insights into the authors' conceptions of leaders and followers – the imaginary 20
21 subjects around which their theories are built.

22
23
24
25 The close reading of the texts suggested that each had a major fracture point, or what 26
27 Critchley (2012:22) referring to Althusser calls 'décalages, displacements or dislocations'.
28
29 These are contradictions in meaning, or arguments whose sense is questionable. We then 30
31 analysed the ways in which each fracture point undermines the theory of leadership being 32
33 propounded.
34
35

36
37
38 We turn now to the first of the three seminal texts.

39 40 41 1. Authentic Transformational Leadership

42
43
44
45 Bass and Steidlmeier's (1999) seminal account of Ethics, Character and Authentic 46
47 Transformational Leadership Behavior (1999), builds on Bass's earlier and highly 48
49 influential theory of transformational leadership (Bass, 1985) and sets the scene for the 50
51 emergence of authentic leadership theory (for critiques see Ford and Harding, 2011;
52
53 Ladkin and Spiller, 2013). Bass and Steidlmeier (1999) set the stage for the encounter as 54
55 follows. They are advocating authentic transformational leadership as an ethical 56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 organizational identity. Authentic transformational leaders (ATL) have moral characters,
4 values embedded in their vision that are ethically legitimate, and they lead followers in 5 moral processes and actions. The ATL uses influence processes, while followers use
6 empowerment processes to engage in ‘dynamic self-transformation’ (183). Followers
7 wish to emulate their leaders because of charisma or idealised influence, the inspirational
8 motivation and intellectual stimulation provided by the ATL, and individualized 9 consideration that they provide (184). They suggest that (186):

20
21
22 ‘it is a matter of modern Western moral concern that ideals not be imposed, that 23 behavior not be coerced, and that the search for truth not be stifled. Ethical norms and 24 behavioral ideals should not be imposed but freely embraced. Motivation should not 25 be reduced to coercion but grow out of authentic inner commitment. Questioning and 26 creativity should be encouraged. Followers should not be mere means to self-
27 satisfying ends for the leader but should be treated as ends in themselves. We label as 28 inauthentic or ‘pseudo’ that kind of transformational leadership that tramples upon 29 those concerns’.

30
31
32 Both leaders and led are transformed by the relationship (186), although the distinction 33 between authentic and pseudo-transformational leadership rests on the presence or 34 absence of moral foundations (186). The following table 1 summarises the distinctions 35 between authentic and pseudo- transformational leadership:

36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60
INSERT TABLE 1 ABOUT HERE

1
2
3 In this theory, the follower must not only agree that the ATL is a highly moral person, but 4 must learn to model themselves on the ATL. The presumption of ATL theory is that the 5 follower will do so. If this is the case, then we suggest that the follower will eventually
6 realise s/he is as good as the leader. If so, then s/he is no longer a follower, but a co-
7 leader. When this happens the leader will have no followers and therefore, without 8 anyone to lead, cannot be a leader. Implicit in this theory therefore is the establishment of 9 a dynamic in which each follower becomes a leader who eventually ceases to be a leader
10 because of his/her success in nurturing their followers (the first fracture point). The 11 successful ATL therefore ensures their own undoing.
12
13
14
15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23

24
25 However, the acknowledged difficulties of distinguishing between authentic and pseudo-26 authentic leadership cannot be ignored, and this indeed is a second, and perhaps more 27 fundamental, fracture point within this theory. Bass and Steidlmeier (1999) point out the 28 difficulties of distinguishing between the two, because the pseudo-ATL wears a mask that,
29 to the outward world, gives the impression of true authenticity. The leader is thus on the 30 horns of a dilemma: how can s/he be sure that the ex-follower is authentically
31 transformational and not pseudo-ATL? If the ATL promotes the follower to leader, and 32 the successor is truly ATL then the organization will survive. But if the ATL is mistaken 33 and promotes someone who is clever enough to disguise their lack of authenticity, then 34 the organization will be put in jeopardy. The ATL cannot therefore risk handing over 35 their place to a follower unless they can be absolutely sure of the follower's authenticity.
36 Proof is always going to be extremely difficult to provide, so the follower will have to 37 strive harder and harder and harder to prove their goodness. The demand to be 38 authentically transformational is thus an ethical norm, but no-one can quite know who is 39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 truly authentically transformational and who is pseudo. Where is then the dividing line
4
5 between being 'truly' authentic and striving to be truly authentic?
6
7

8
9 Further, Nietzsche, Sartre, Freud and other major philosophers all see bad conscience as 10
11 foundational within the human psyche (Butler, 2000). This is what makes authentic 12
13 transformational leadership, as outlined by Bass and Steidlmeier, impossible. The ATL 14
15 has no weaknesses. But to be authentic requires that one examines one's self and 16
17 identifies one's weaknesses and failings, and all the things that cause the terrible internal,
18
19 mocking and admonitory voice. If one knows that one is always struggling to be good, or 20
21 decent, or efficient, or whatever, then one must acknowledge that to pretend to the moral 22
23 high ground is to be a pseudo-ATL. The pseudo-ATL is therefore an inevitable aspect of 24
25 the truly authentic transformational leader. One cannot ask one's followers to emulate 26
27 one, because they would have to emulate one's weaknesses as well as one's strengths. To 28
29 be authentic requires that one refuses to be a role model for one's followers, and refuses 30
31 to ask them for recognition of the self as ATL. The distinction between ATL and pseudo-32
33 ATL thus disappears: through striving to attain the norm the self must compromise 34
35 aspects of the self, hiding its weaknesses. Bass and Steidlmeier's theory sets up the 36
37 pseudo-ATL and the ATL as opposites, so that if one is not authentically transformational 38
39 then one must be pseudo-ATL. There is no half-way house, no position from which one 40
41 can examine one's self in one's full glory as a complex, riven human being, with 42
43 weaknesses as well as strengths. Table 2 below explores this further: 44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51

52 INSERT TABLE 2 ABOUT HERE
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 To become an authentic transformational leader therefore requires that one acknowledges
4 that it is impossible to be an authentic transformational leader. The identity is destroyed
5 by its own foundations. What there is instead is a struggling human subject trying to 6 exist in complex, demanding work environments (Harding, 2015). D.W.Winnicott
7 (1953) reduced the pressure on women to be perfect mothers: just be a 'good enough'
8 mother. The implication of this reading for training and developing people as leaders is:
9 be a 'good enough' leader. To aspire to be perfect, authentic, charismatic, always 10 successful, always inspirational, is to aspire for the unattainable.
11
12

13
14
15 The 'follower' in this theory is therefore: an empty vessel waiting to be filled with the 16 ATL's qualities; a threat to the ATL as s/he comes to take over the ATL's role, someone
17 who can be duped by a pseudo-ATL, and someone who may themselves become a
18 pseudo-ATL. This follower is both vitally necessary to ATL, but also a danger to it. To 19 avoid becoming a danger, we suggest, the follower in this theory must remain an empty
20 vessel, an object waiting to be vitalized by the electrical spark of the leader's authenticity, 21 but never actually brought to life, because if it were enlivened it would undermine the 22 very theory that is supposed to inspire it. But that empty vessel can also undermine the 23 theory at its roots, as because to admit of 'the follower' as a complex subject who might 24 respond in a variety of ways to the leader's initiatives would be to negate the theory ab
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47 initio.

48 49 50 2. Gronn's distributed leadership (2002)

51
52
53 We turn now to a theory of leadership that removes followers altogether from its purview.
54
55
56 Published in The Leadership Quarterly (2002), this seminal paper in theories of 57
58
59
60

1
2
3 distributed leadership offers a perspective developed as a critique of dominant models of 4 the ‘solo or stand-alone leader’ (423). Distributed leadership is aligned, Gronn suggests,
5 with what he describes as current modes of working, where the division of labour is ever-
6 changing, and there is task differentiation and reintegration such that ‘new workplace
7 imperatives are generating qualitatively different forms of interdependence between 8 organizational personnel [that] have stimulated the adoption of distributed modes of work
9 coordination’ (425). In distributed leadership, as defined in Gronn’s paper, the tasks
10 carried out by leaders may be distributed within a group which, collectively, carries out 11 the traditional leadership tasks.
12
13
14
15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23

24
25 Gronn’s first task is to critique the ‘two sacrosanct binaries or dualisms’ that have defined 26 leadership theory: leader-followers and leadership-followership which, he argues,
27 prescribe rather than describe a division of labour (428). He is sympathetic to Miller’s 28 (1998) argument of the need to ‘dispense with the category of followership’ (427), with 29 organization becoming ‘a process of negotiation between leaders’ (Miller, 1998, in Gronn, 30 2002:427).
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39

40 Gronn (2002:428) defines leadership as ‘a status ascribed to one individual, an aggregate 41 of separate individuals, sets of small numbers of individuals acting in concert or larger 42 plural-member organizational units’ in which organization members voluntarily attribute 43 influence to one or other of the focal units. The attribution of influence may be through 44 direct or vicarious experience (the latter referring to reputation), and its scope is ‘the 45 workplace-related activities defined by the employment contracts which operate in 46 particular contexts’ (428). Potentially all organization members may have influence and 47 thus be leaders, because influence must be distinguished from authority (which managers 48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 have). Duration of the attributed influence may be short or long term. Distributive
4
5 leadership is ‘concerted action’, that is, collaborative modes of working that arise
6
7 spontaneously, intuitive understanding developed through close working relationships,
8
9 and structural and institutionalised arrangements which aim to ‘regularise’ distributed 10
11 action. There is conjoint agency (431) where actions are synchronised through a 12
13 psychological bond between the parties (431) that develops within the framework of 14
15 authority relations of the employment contract. Interdependent working relationships
16
17 ‘cement the trust conducive to a nonthreatening emotional climate and peer support’ 18
19 (433), but they are threatened by ‘the rhetoric of leader-followership’ (434). Finally, 20
21 Gronn discusses training; this should equip individuals ‘to cope with flexible space’ and 22
23 would require developing the ability to take a strategic view of ‘what needs doing and the 24
25 ability to develop complementary relationships’ (442) and would, it seems, take the focus 26
27 away from individual job-holding. Leadership is later referred to as ‘the contextualised 28
29 outcome of interactive ... processes’ where there is a ‘fluidity of ... spontaneous 30
31 collaboration and intuitive working relations ... along with the continuity of workplace 32
33 relations implied by the idea of institutionalised practices’ (444).
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41

42 Although it might be suggested that our interpretation of distributed leadership is overly 43
44 literal, our analysis leads us to conclude that in Gronn’s approach, leadership is an 45
46 outcome of interactive processes, rather than an input into organizational processes. There
47
48 are no followers: people emerge who take the lead in some aspects of a process (because 49
50 they have a strategic view of what needs to be done and how to do it), while others 51
52 emerge who take the lead in other aspects of the same process (implying that when they 53
54 are not in leadership roles they are not-leaders, because they cannot be followers).
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 That aspect of our data analysis that seeks to find out how the scene of encounter between 4 leader and follower is imagined therefore did not work at this point – there are only 5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

That aspect of our data analysis that seeks to find out how the scene of encounter between leader and follower is imagined therefore did not work at this point – there are only leaders in this theory, although the implications of the paper's arguments is that there will be times when people are not-leaders. However, there are fracture points in this model:

1. The issue of whether or not a follower-less leader can actually be a leader, because by definition someone cannot lead without having someone who follows. Leader is a term that infers a relationship, much like mother or daughter in contrast to words like woman or girl, which can stand independently (Rioch, 1971). So, in the same way that there is an implicit assumption of a parent when the word son is used, so too does the word leader only make sense with the word follower implied within it;
2. A presumption of harmonious organizational working, where issues of power and the frailties of being human are absent. Even if not emerging within positive psychology, the approach is remarkably optimistic. It ignores the possibility of anything but consensus, and presumes that each member of the organization shares the same 'vision' of what should be done, how it should be done, and with what ends in mind. That is, staff are one-dimensional and have one emotion: happiness;
3. This leads to the understanding that if emotionally positive aspects of work are defined as 'leadership', then everything that is not emotionally positive is 'not leadership', limiting leadership's focus in ways unintended by the theory;
4. Thus is this theory an attempt at colonisation, in that all everyday (harmonious) working relationships are re-labelled 'leadership? If so, how should we

1
2
3 understand the numerous, and well-attested situations, when there is disagreement,
4
5 quarrelling, politics, striving for one's own advancement at the expense of others,
6
7 etc?
8
9

10
11 Further, the performativity of language (Butler, 1990; 1993) means that attempts to 12
13 ignore, if not eradicate, followers must inevitably fail so long as the term 'leader' 14
15 circulates. The performativity of the term, the way it serves to constitute subject positions 16
17 and identities, rests on the existence of the very necessary binary other of leadership, that 18
19 is, the follower. To abolish the term 'follower' requires abolishing the term 'leader'. To 20
21 attempt to claim otherwise is a terminological sleight of hand. Thus in a team where the 22
23 tasks of leadership are distributed, the tasks of followership must also, it follows, be 24
25 distributed. Everyone thus becomes both a leader and a follower.
26
27
28
29

30
31 Gronn's thesis implies that the scene of encounter (in which followers have been written 32
33 out, even though they must be there if leadership is to be discussed) is harmonious and 34
35 lacking dissensus, with no political activities, no power play, and an absence of bad 36
37 temper or tiredness, with everyone tuned in to achieving the task in hand. The angelic 38
39 people who should staff organizations must therefore suppress all aspects of the self that 40
41 do not contribute to such an utopia. That is, they must become super-human and have no
42
43 weaknesses. Whereas authentic transformational leadership presumes that the follower
44
45 can be guided by the leader towards achieving normative ideal behaviours, participants 46
47 involved in distributive leadership somehow know, without discussion or education, how 48
49 to be ideal leaders and not-leaders as we seek to explore in table 3 below.
50
51
52
53
54

55
56 INSERT TABLE 3 ABOUT HERE
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 But, as we argued above, organizations are staffed by fallible human beings. They are 4 places rife with politics, ill-temper, controls, resistance against those controls, and so on.
5
6 Anyone attempting to maintain the absurdly high ideals outlined for leaders (and not-7
8 leaders) in this theory are therefore doomed to failure. To step up to become a leader 9
10 could, in distributive leadership, threaten the volunteer with inevitable failure.
11
12
13

14
15
16 Thus Gronn's theory requires that there be Utopian organisations where all power, 17
18 conflict and the sheer complexities of being human has been eliminated. It is only in such 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Indeed, distributive leadership theory starts from the perspective of a teamwork where participants take responsibility for those aspects of the job for which they are best suited. While these tasks are undertaken through teamwork, or the pleasure in working on a project with committed colleagues, or whatever other reason, there is the prospective of success, job satisfaction and desire perhaps to carry on with the next project, absorbing the lessons from the current project, and thus continuing to improve. However, to take this teamwork and re-label it 'leadership', and furthermore a leadership without followers, could to destroy that very thing that was found so attractive and desirable in the first place.

46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

What then is the implicit academic theory of the follower that informs distributive leadership theory? We suggest this model is underpinned by a quite sophisticated theory, albeit unarticulated. Note that Gronn advocated interdependent working relationships that would cement trust and thus succour a nonthreatening emotional climate and peer support (433), and he saw 'the rhetoric of leader-followership' (434) as destructive of such

1
2
3 relationships. This implies that to be identified as a follower is to become someone who
4 is negative, disinclined to teamwork, and destructive of ‘emotional climate’ more
5 generally. He thus seems to have insights into how identities in which some people are 6 positioned as superior to inferior others have a damaging effect on those understood to be 7 inferior.
8
9

10
11 12
13
14
15
16 However, rather than eradicating the cause of this destructive labelling, that is, the leader,
17 he attempts to eradicate the follower. He thus retains the ‘sacrosanct’ binaries he wished 18 to expunge.
19 20 21
22
23

24 3. Greenleaf’s theory of Servant Leadership

25
26
27 Greenleaf’s iconic book, Servant Leadership (1977), is a collection of essays and 28 speeches rather than a book-length exposition of servant leadership, and indeed, apart
29 from the first chapter, there is often little direct reference in its various chapters to servant
30 leadership. The book starts with the author introducing himself to the reader as a 31 practising manager who is antipathetic to academia – he seeks actions rather than thought.
32
33 The theory of servant leadership that he offers is inspired by a story by Herman Hesse
34 and there is something of the spiritual and mystical throughout the theory that Greenleaf
35 develops. He draws on a curious mixture of sources (Albert Camus, the I Ching, etc.), 36 plus anecdotes relating to anonymous people who supposedly demonstrate great 37 leadership, and observations about past leaders.
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50

51
52 Greenleaf was despairing about the state of the United States at the time he wrote the 53 book, and he looks forward to a desirable (albeit vague) future that can be achieved
54 through servant leadership. His view of the United States in the mid-1970s was of a 55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 country that was in dire straits – there was a crisis of leadership (11); communities had 4
5 broken down (37) and been replaced by mal-functioning institutions; there was a 6
7 ‘disposition to venture into immoral and senseless wars, destruction of the environment,
8
9 poverty, alienation, discrimination, over-population (46-7) all because of individual 10
11 human failures ‘one person at a time’. Servant-leaders could lead the way out of this 12
13 dystopian present. Unlike the authors discussed above, Greenleaf acknowledges that the 14
15 ‘human condition’ is one of imperfection (12), but he still seems to cling to the idea of 16
17 there being some people who are above such imperfections – these are the servant-leaders.
18
19 20
21
22 However, there is a lack of definition of what Greenleaf means by leader, follower and 23
24 servant and, it follows, of servant-leadership. There is a lot of description of the ideal
25
26 leader that seems to encapsulate elements of what the absolute ideal, the servant-leader, 27
28 would be like. We can tease this out by identifying in his arguments what he says about 29
30 poor and ideal leaders and followers, because there is within Greenleaf’s discussion an 31
32 implicit model of the poor and the ideal leader, and the poor and ideal follower, and the 33
34 ideal-ideal in both leader and follower. Table 4 below develops this further.
35
36
37
38
39

40
41 INSERT TABLE 4 ABOUT HERE
42

43
44 What is striking is the degree to which Greenleaf’s servant leader is beyond human 45
46 achievement and therefore impossible for mere mortals to attain. This weakness is 47
48 acknowledged by recent more critical writings, including those of Collinson and Tourish 49
50 (forthcoming) who report in footnote 8 to their paper that the characteristics identified for 51
52 servant leaders seemed to be growing exponentially: ‘For example, Spears (1995)
53
54 suggested that servant leadership had ten major characteristics. But a more recent review 55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 indicates that this has grown to forty-four (van Dierendonck, 2011). These include
4
5 courage, vision, the ability to exercise transforming influence (while empowering others),
6
7 and humility. This clearly poses implementation challenges. Attending to forty four 8
9 characteristics in one's daily leadership practice would require levels of sagacity rarely 10
11 found outside Mount Olympus'. There is something of an impossibility to servant
12
13 leadership. Servant-leaders are paragons of virtue. They are 'functionally superior 14
15 because they are closer to the ground – they hear things, see things, know things, and 16
17 their intuitive insight is exceptional' (42). They aim to make sure that 'other people's 18
19 highest priority needs are being served' (13), with the aim of supporting those other 20
21 people to themselves become servants.
22
23
24
25
26

27
28 But his understanding of 'servant' differs from the colloquial: Greenleaf uses the term to 29
30 refer to someone 'who wants to serve, to serve first' (p. 13). The common-sense 31
32 understanding of the word, as someone who works in a menial position keeping the home
33
34 of someone else clean, tidy and well-functioning, does not seem to be applicable to 35
36 Greenleaf's theory. He contrasts the person who wishes to serve first with the person who 37
38 wishes to be leader first 'perhaps because of the need to assuage an unusual power drive
39
40 or to acquire material possessions' (p. 13), thus elevating as the distinction between 'good'
41
42 and 'poor' leaders the motivation to take on leadership roles. In this his theory is 43
44 somewhat akin to Bass and Steidlmeier's (1999) contrast between authentic and pseudo-45
46 authentic transformational leaders. However, it is Greenleaf's choice of the term 'servant'
47
48 and his redefinition of it as someone who serves by taking the lead for the common good, 49
50 that we suggest is the fracture point in this model.
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

1
2
3 There is little about followers in his text, beyond a presumption Greenleaf shares with 4 many writers on leadership: good leaders encourage growth and development in their 5 followers. However, sprinkled throughout his essays are references to those who, he 6 thinks, need to be led by servant-leaders, and it is these references that give insights. He 7 refers to ‘the legions of deprived and unsophisticated people’, to ‘the “typical” person –
8 immature, stumbling, inept, lazy’ (p. 21); ‘half-people’ (p. 21). It is leaders’ superior
9 abilities that mark them out as leaders – they have better judgement than others (p. 23);
10 their intuition is superior; they are better listeners, and have superior foresight.
11
12

13 Greenleaf thus imagines two classes of people: the vast majority of ‘unsophisticated 14 people’ from which servants (those who serve an individual or a family and occupy more 15 or less menial roles) are drawn, and the superior, exalted few from which those who serve 16 (what is argued to be) the common good are drawn. He develops such notions further in 17 his later work, to add to his earlier prophesy in relation to the effect of his model on ‘the 18 least privileged in society’ (1977, p.7), adding an addendum that ‘no-one will knowingly 19 be hurt by the action, directly or indirectly’ (Greenleaf, (1998, p.43). In other words, 20 Greenleaf’s account implicitly introduces into leadership theory presumptions about class.
21 The thesis underlying his account appears to be of a lumpen proletariat that can be saved 22 from their fate not by a revolution but by servant leaders who will nurture the 23 development of those few who have the capacity to develop and who in turn may succeed 24 themselves to become servant leaders.
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Discussion and conclusion

In both Bass and Steidlmeir's (1999) paper on authentic transformational leadership and Greenleaf's theory of servant leadership the follower is, on the one hand, imagined as an empty vessel awaiting filling by the leader's inspiration. But on the other hand there may be elements of fear underpinning this desire. Throughout the history of the US-authored management textbook there has been a sub-text of fear of the masses, and what they would or could do if they rose up (Harding, 2003). That is, the 'reds under the bed' myth that led to McCarthyism informed the collective unconscious (Jameson, 1991), of the United States' governing classes, leading to conscious and unconscious attempts at control. We suggest the possibility that leadership theory's long trajectory articulates a wish-fulfilment in which the masses become followers who are so seduced by their leaders the thought of rising up against them would never occur.

We have shown how Bass and Steidlmeir have built into their theory the seeds of its own downfall, in that authentic and pseudo-authentic transformational leaders are indistinguishable. The staff members motivated to become leaders may have within their ranks those pretending to authenticity in order to mask their own purposes. Again, fear stalks the gaps and interstices in this model. In Greenleaf's theory of servant leadership there is, we have suggested, an almost overt reworking of ideas of class conflict – the lumpen proletariat are capable of being assuaged and pacified by a rare few people with special and unusual qualities – an aristocracy with refined sensibilities and superior powers. We suggest that the implicit academic theory of followers that informs writing on leadership is one that echoes the fears of the powerful through the millennia: that the mob is always straining at the ramparts, ready to destroy civilisation.

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11 12
13
14
15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Gronn's theory of distributed leadership at first sight appears somewhat different. Whereas Bass & Steidlmeir's and Greenleaf's basic presumption of humanity is Hobbesian, in that people are assumed to be born bad and need controlling and educating, Gronn's appears to be more akin to Rousseau's understanding that people are born good but circumstances can turn them bad. Gronn actually identifies leadership theory as one of the factors that can turn people bad, but his courage fails him and he does not follow the implications of his arguments, which is that leadership should be eradicated. He therefore does away with the masses, at the stroke of a pen. They disappear, in a unitarist dream of harmonious organizations where everyone works towards a shared outcome.

We therefore suggest that what unites these three perspectives on leadership is a sense of elitism (leaders are destined to govern) and power use (and potential abuse) of those with less power. In all three approaches, power is the elephant that lurks in between the lines, peers out from the fissures and languishes in the gaps in logic. But it is unacknowledged. In authentic transformational leadership, there appears to be a veneer of 'helping' followers to achieve beyond their wildest dreams but the reality is the continuing aggrandizement of the heroic leader. The leader is transcendental and omnipotent, both elitist and anti-democratic. History is replete with illustrations of ways in which charismatic, transformational and power-hungry individuals use coercive pressure to lead people to evil ends (Tourish, 2013). In distributive accounts, there is a pretence that the workforce is made up of equals, all working towards the same harmonious ends. As Alan Fox (1966) pointed out long ago, such a unitarist perspective disguises structural and hierarchical power. In servant leadership accounts, the pretence of putting the follower at

1
2
3 centre-stage, to be served by the leader, belies the theory's attempt to use the power of 4
5 the elite to control those who are regarded as an inferior and unsophisticated hoi polloi.
6
7

8
9 So disinterring the theory of follower/ship that silently informs major theories of 10
11 leadership suggests leadership theory is the pursuit of control of a potentially dangerous 12
13 mass through the use of power.
14
15

16
17 This leads to the question of the form this power takes. Since Lukes' (2005) seminal 18
19 work on power we have become accustomed to thinking about power as not only an 20
21 external weight that presses on people, but as a way of controlling even their very 22
23 thoughts and desires. Foucault's concept of power as not only oppressive but productive, 24
25 in that it brings things into being, placed power in circulating discourses and in the very 26
27 materiality of the body's synapses. As Butler (1997) pointed out, power presses on us and 28
29 limits us at the same time as making the 'me' possible.
30
31
32

33
34 But the power that informs leadership theory is a peculiar form of power. Firstly, it has 35
36 performative force: an industry of leadership development has sprung up around the 37
38 world, with management consultancies, training agencies, universities and colleges all 39
40 contributing to turning managers into leaders. Numerous people seem to prefer to call 41
42 themselves leaders rather than managers (O'Reilly and Reed, 2011).
43
44
45

46
47 But there is no evidence at all that all these leaders have any influence over their putative
48
49 followers. Indeed, there may be some evidence to the contrary, as noted above, that is, 50
51 someone becomes a leader only because staff accord her/him with the title of leader.
52
53

54
55 Therefore the power that circulates in leadership theory is a power over those who 56
57 become called leaders. It confers on them that identity, and requires that they conform to 58
59
60

1
2
3 the norms and practices that govern that subject position. But leadership theory is so
4 divorced from practice, that is, from material encounters between people in workplaces,
5 that it cannot advise leaders on how to govern followers. All it does is provide empty 6 promises about the leader's ability to fill up the follower with their own charisma, or 7 authenticity, or goodness, or abilities.
8
9

10
11 12
13
14
15
16 So perhaps the absence of studies of followers/ship has been a blessing in disguise. A 17 supposed elite of thinkers has devised models, theories, training courses, consultancies, 18 conferences and so on. The leadership industry is vast and global. But its powers are 19 limited to persuading managers to call themselves leaders, while those who should be 20 their followers are unexplored, unknown and untheorised. They get on with their working 21 lives while their managers busy themselves with the impossible task of becoming the 22 authentic, charismatic, servant who does not serve, and leader who does not lead.
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31

32
33 So even as we are critical of leadership theory's lack of understanding of the complexities
34 of the human subject, we cannot argue that it needs to replace its simplistic presumptions
35 of followers – it is best to leave well alone. Rather, it is the leadership industry's 36 continuing effects on managers that need our attention.
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

References

Bass B (1985) Leadership and Performance Beyond Expectations, New York: Free Press.

Bass B and Steidlmeier P (1999) Ethics, Character, and Authentic Transformational Leadership Behavior, Leadership Quarterly, 10(2), 181-217.

Bligh M (2011) 'Followership and follower-centred approaches' in Bryman A, Collinson D, Grint K, Jackson B and Uhl-Bien M. The Sage Handbook of Leadership, London: Sage. Pp 425-436.

Bligh M, Kohles J and Pillai R (2011) 'Romancing leadership: past, present and future', The Leadership Quarterly, 22: 1058-1077.

Bligh M, Pillai R and Uhl-Bien M (2007) 'The social construction of a legacy: summarising and extending follower-centred perspectives on leadership'. In Shamir B, Pillai R, Bligh M and Uhl-Bien M. Follower-Centered Perspectives on Leadership: A Tribute to the Memory of James R. Meindl. Greenwich, CT: Information Age Publishing, pp 265-277.

Brown AD (2004) Authoritative sensemaking in a public inquiry report. Organization Studies, 25:1, 95-112.

Bryman A (2004) Qualitative research on leadership: A critical but appreciative review, Leadership Quarterly, 15(5), 721-891.

Burns, J. M. (1978). Leadership. New York: Harper & Row.

Butler J (1990) Gender Trouble: Feminism and the Subversion of Identity, New York: Routledge.

Butler J (1993) Bodies that Matter, New York: Routledge.

Butler J (1997) The Psychic Life of Power, Stanford, CA: Stanford University Press.

Butler J (2000) Antigone's claim. New York: Columbia University Press.

Calás MB and Smircich L (1991) 'Voicing Seduction to Silence Leadership', Organization Studies, 12, 567-602.

Carsten M, Uhl-Bien M, West B, Patera J and McGregor R (2010) 'Exploring social constructions of followership: A qualitative study', The Leadership Quarterly, 21: 543-562.

1
2
3 Challeff I (1998). The courageous follower: Standing up to and for our leaders. San 4 Francisco: Berrett-Koehler Publishers.

6
7 Ciulla J (1998) Ethics: the heart of leadership, London: Praeger

8
9 Collinson D (2006). Rethinking followership: A post-structuralist analysis of follower
10 identities. The Leadership Quarterly, 17(2), 179–189.

11
12 Collinson D (2011) ‘Critical leadership studies.’ In Bryman A, Collinson D, Grint K,
13 Jackson B and Uhl-Bien M (Eds.) The Sage Handbook of Leadership. London: Sage, pp.
14 179-192.

15
16
17 Collinson D and Tourish D (forthcoming) Teaching leadership critically: New directions for leadership pedagogy. Academy of 18 Management Learning and Education 2015; forthcoming. doi: 10.5465/amle.2014.0079

19
20 Critchley S (2012) The faith of the faithless. London: Verso.

21
22 Crossman B and Crossman J (2011) Conceptualising followership: a review of the 23 literature, Leadership, 7 (4): 481-497

24
25 De Vries RE and Van Gelder J (2005). Leadership and the need for leadership: Testing an 26 implicit followership theory. In Schyns, B and Meindl JR (Eds.), Implicit leadership
27 theories: Essays and explorations. Greenwich, CN: Information Age Publishers, pp. 277– 28 304.

29
30
31 Ford J (2005) ‘Examining leadership through critical feminist readings’. Jo. Health
32 Organization and Management. 19 (3), 236-251.

33
34
35 Ford J and Harding N (2011) ‘The impossibility of the ‘true self’ of authentic leadership:
36 a critique through object relations theory’, Leadership, 7 (4): 463-479.

37
38
39 Ford J, Harding N and Learmonth M (2008) Leadership as Identity: Constructions and 40 Deconstructions. Basingstoke, Hampshire: Palgrave Macmillan.

41
42 Fox A (1966) Industrial Sociology and Industrial Relations, Royal Commission on Trade
43 Unions and Employers’ Associations, Research Papers 3, HMSO, London.

44
45 Gergen KJ (1985) Social Constructionist Inquiry: Context and Implications. In Gergen, 46 KJ and Davis K (Eds.) The Social Construction of the Person. New York. Springer-
47 Verlag.

48
49
50 Gergen KJ (1991) The saturated self dilemmas of identity in contemporary life. New 51 York: Basic Books.

52
53
54 Gergen KJ (1998) Constructionist Dialogues and the Vicissitudes of the Politics. In 55 Velody, Irving and Williams, Robin (Eds.) The Politics of Constructionism. London:
56 Sage. pp. 33-48.

- 1
2
3 Gergen KJ (1999) An Invitation To Social Construction. Thousand Oaks, CA: SAGE.
4
5 Greenleaf, R. (1977) Servant Leadership, New Jersey: Paulist Press.
6
7
8 Greenleaf, R. K. 1998. The power of servant-leadership. San Francisco: Berrett-Koehler.
9
10 Grint K (2005) Leadership: Limits and Possibilities. London: Palgrave.
11
12 Gronn P (2002) Distributed leadership as a unit of analysis, The Leadership Quarterly, 13 13: 423-451.
14
15 Harding N (2003) The Social Construction of Management: texts and identities. London:
16 Routledge.
17
18
19 Harding N (forthcoming, 2015) 'Studying followers' in Carroll B, Ford J and Taylor S.
20 Leadership: Contemporary Critical Perspectives. London: Sage.
21
22
23 Hollander EP (1992) Leadership, followership, self, and others. The Leadership
24 Quarterly, 3, 43–54.
25
26 Hollander E (1998) Ethical challenges in the leader-follower relationship. In Ciulla J (ed)
27 Ethics: the heart of leadership, London: Praeger, pp49-62.
28
29
30 Howell J and Mendez M (2008) Three perspectives on followership. In: Riggio R, 31 Chaleff I and Lipman-Blument J (eds) The Art of Followership: How Great Followers
32 Create Great Leaders and Organizations. San Francisco: Jossey-Bass, 25–39 33
34
35 Jackson B and Parry K (2011) A very short, fairly interesting and reasonably cheap book
36 about studying leadership. 2nd ed, London: Sage.
37
38
39 Jameson F (1991) Postmodernism, or, The Cultural Logic of Late Capitalism. London, 40 Verso.
41
42 Kelley RE (1992) The power of followership: how to create leaders people want to follow,
43 and followers who lead themselves. New York: Bantam.
44
45
46 Ladkin D and Spiller C (2013) Authentic leadership: Clashes, convergences and 47 coalescences. Cheltenham, UK: Edward Elgar.
48
49
50
51 Lukes S (2005) Power: A Radical View. London: Palgrave Macmillan.
52
53
54 Meindl JR (1995) The romance of leadership as a follower-centric theory: A social 55 constructionist approach. The Leadership Quarterly, 6, 329–341.
56
57
58 O'Reilly D and Reed M (2011) The Grit in the Oyster: Professionalism, Managerialism
59 and Leaderism as Discourses of UK Public Services Modernization, Organization Studies, 60 32(8): 1079-1101.

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11 12
13
14
15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60

Riggio RE, Chaleff I and Lipman-Blumen J (eds) (2008) The art of followership: how great followers create great leaders and organizations. San Francisco, CA: Jossey-Bass.

Shamir B (2007). 'From passive recipients to active co-producers: Followers' roles in the leadership process.' In Shamir B, Pillai R, Bligh M, and Uhl-Bien M, (Eds.) follower-centered perspectives on leadership: A tribute to the memory of James R. Meindl (pp. ix-xxxix). Greenwich, CT: Information Age Publishing.

Shamir B, Pillai R, Bligh M and Uhl-Bien, M (2007) Follower-Centered Perspectives on Leadership: A Tribute to the Memory of James R. Meindl. Greenwich, CT: Information Age Publishing.

Shondrik SJ, Dinh JE and Lord RG (2010). Developments in implicit leadership theory and cognitive science: applications to improving measurement and understanding alternatives to hierarchical leadership. The Leadership Quarterly, 26(6), 959-978.

Shotter J and Gergen K (1989) Texts of Identity London: Sage Publications.

Shotter J (1993) Conversational Realities. Constructing Life through Language. London: Sage.

Stech EL (2008) A new leadership-followership paradigm. In Riggio RE, Chaleff I and Lipman-Blumen J (eds) (2008) The art of followership: how great followers create great leaders and organizations. San Francisco, CA: Jossey-Bass. Pp. 41-52.

Sy T (2010) What do you think of followers? Examining the content, structure, and consequences of implicit followership theories. Organizational Behavior and Human Decision Processes 113 (2), 73-84.

Tourish D (2013). The dark side of transformational leadership: A critical perspective. London: Routledge.

Winnicott D (1953) Transitional objects and transitional phenomena, International Journal of Psychoanalysis, 34:89-97

Zoller HM and Fairhurst GT (2007) Resistance as leadership: a critical, discursive perspective. Human Relations, 60, 1331-1360.

Table 1: Bass and Steidlmeier’s Authentic and pseudo-transformational leadership

	Authentic Transformational Leadership – Ideals for their followers.	Pseudo-Transformational Leadership – Idols of their followers
Charisma or idealised influence	Envisioning, confident, sets high standards for emulation. Values: universal brotherhood. Promote ethical policies, procedures and processes. Must ‘eventuate in the internalization in all the organization’s members of shared moral standards’ (188)	Seek power and position, and indulge in fantasies of power and success. Values: grandiose, fictitious we-they relationships that divide. Inconsistent and unreliable. False to organisation’s purpose. Outer shell of authenticity but it is a mask.
Inspirational motivation	Focus on the best in people, and harmony, charity and good works. Empowerment to transform the person. Inwardly and outwardly concerned about the good of everyone.	Focuses on the worst in people, on demonic plots, conspiracies, unreal dangers, excuses, and insecurities. Talk about empowerment but only to seek control. May give impression of concern for the good, may be idealized by their followers, but inwardly concerned only about the good for themselves.
Intellectual stimulation	Openness, with a transcendent and spiritual dimension, allows followers to question assumptions and generate more creative solutions. Altruism is a fundamental question. Use persuasion to convince others on the merits of issues. Bring about change in followers’ values by the merit and relevancy of their ideas.	Uses a logic of false assumptions to ‘slay the dragons of uncertainty, take credit for other’s ideas, scapegoat them for failure. Use anecdotes rather than hard evidence. Charlatans who feed on the ignorance of their followers. Manipulate the values of followers. Only does the right thing when it coincides with their self-interest. Intolerant of other views, substituting emotional argumentation for rational discourse.
Individualized consideration	Underscores necessity of altruism. Treats each follower as an individual, coaches and mentors. Concerned about developing their followers into leaders. Promote attainable shared goals. Helps followers to develop their leadership skills. Channel their need for power into the service of others.	Concerned with maintaining the dependence of their followers. Exploit followers’ feelings to maintain deference. Expect blind obedience. Encourage fantasy and magic. Foments favouritism and competition among followers. Seeks a parent-child relationship. Uses power for self-aggrandisement. Privately derisive of those they are ‘supposed to be serving as leaders’ (189). Public image (that of saviours) contradicts their private selves

Table 2: Bass and Steidlmeier's Authentic and pseudo-transformational leadership: Stated and implicit followership theory

	Authentic Transformational Leadership – Ideals for their followers.	Pseudo-Transformational Leadership – Idols of their followers
Followers' position - stated	'inner dynamics of a freely embraced change of heart in the realm of core values and motivation, open-ended intellectual stimulation and commitment to treating people as ends not mere means' (192). They will learn the values of justice, equality and human rights. Will develop an inner ethical core in which self-interest is secondary. Follower-leader distinction should wither away (200), as 'true consensus in aligning individual and organizational interests' (207).	Followers are fantasists who engage in the leaders' fantasies.
Followers' position - implicit	Empty vessels waiting to be filled with goodness by the leader/teacher, much as happens in cults. However, less valued than shareholders, senior management and continuity of the organization (204), but the successful ATL develops them so that they become ATLs themselves.	Followers are gullible vessels easily taken in by appearances, who do not realise they are being used and exploited.

Table 3 Gronn’s theory of distributed leadership and implicit theories

Distributive leadership	Implicit followership theories
Gronn advocated interdependent working relationships that would cement trust and thus succour a nonthreatening emotional climate and peer support (433), and he saw ‘the rhetoric of leader-followership’ (434) as destructive of such relationships.	Gronn appears to recognise the performative effect of the term ‘follower’. That is, to be placed in the subject position of ‘follower’ requires that one become negative, disinclined to teamwork, and destructive of ‘emotional climate’ more generally. This is a highly critical approach with which we agree.
Distributed Leadership as a process of negotiation between leaders (427)	If the term ‘follower’ is so destructive, then it must be replaced with a more positive term. Gronn does not follow through on his critical stance, or recognise the imbrication of the term ‘leader’ with ‘the follower’. The implicit theory here appears to be that the only way to remove the destructiveness of the term ‘follower’ is to eliminate it from speech - DL ‘dispenses with the category of followership’ (427). The term ‘leader’ now expands to encompass all identities in the organization, or rather all harmonious identities. The implicit theory here perhaps is that of the bee-hive, where all are workers servicing the needs of the Queen Bee qua organization. That is, all are drones.
Distributed Leadership as ‘concerted action’ (429) of collaborative modes of working, intuitive understandings and supportive structural and organizational arrangements	Gronn returns to seemingly out-dated and out-moded models of unitarist organizations. There is no room for dissent and no understanding of power. Everyone must comply with the dominant order. The implication of Gronn’s theory is that everyone will comply. Leadership becomes a matter of mind-control in which no deviation from organizational requirements is permissible.
Training should equip individuals to ‘cope with flexible space’ and this would require developing the ability to take a strategic view of ‘what needs doing and the ability to develop complementary relationships’ (442)	This reveals most profoundly Gronn’s implicit understanding of the people who form the staff of organizations – that is, they are not able to work collaboratively, to take charge of their own work, etc., unless they receive training that will inculcate these abilities. The lumpen proletariat underpins Gronn’s theory – people, he presumes, are essentially lazy, lack foresight, a capacity for team-work, innovation, knowledge sharing, etc. This suggests his concerns about the term ‘follower’ revolve around its failure to tackle the

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11 12
13
14
15
16
17
18 19 20 21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48 49 recalcitrance he sees in the average staff member.

--	--

For Peer Review

Table 4: Greenleaf’s implicit leadership and followership theories

The poor leader	The ideal leader	The ideal follower	The poor follower	The servant leader	The servant as follower
They are unable to envision what needs to happen, ‘too many who presume to lead do not see more clearly and in defence of this inadequacy, they all the more strongly argue that the system must be preserved’ (15)	The ideal leader is ‘better than most at pointing the direction’ (15). ‘The very essence of leadership, going out to show the way, derives from more than usual openness to inspiration’ (15) The ideal leader gives followers clear direction ‘more clearly where it is best to go’ (15)	The ideal follower follows the leader. Followers are helpless and incapable of knowing the direction in which to go. Leaders are persuasive and trustworthy who provide a goal for followers, ‘an overarching purpose, the big dream, the visionary concept...that excites the imagination and challenges people to work for something they do not yet know how to do’ (16)		‘Servants, by definition, are fully human. Servant-leaders are functionally superior because they are closer to the ground – they hear things, see things, know things, and their intuitive insights is exceptional’ (42).	The ideal followers grow and become servant leaders themselves: ‘The follower chooses to follow the servant leader, so that ‘those served grow as persons... [and] while being served become healthier, wiser, freer, more autonomous, more likely themselves to become servants.’ (7)
		They have no agency and no need to think for themselves.		They have ‘unlimited liability for others .
	‘A leader initiates, provides the ideas and the structure, and takes the risk of failure along with the chance of success’ (15)	Again, the ideal follower falls in behind the leader and does whatever is asked of her/him.		p. 7 the great leader is seen as servant first. By that he means that this leader is ‘deep down inside’ a servant (7) and leadership is bestowed upon such a person. Leadership can thus be taken away, but the ‘servant nature’ is the ‘real man’ and cannot be taken away (8)	If the leader is one who would serve, then the follower becomes servant to the leader, helping him/her achieve his/her vision of serving. Language, it seems, is turned upside down, as in George Orwell’s 1984 where language becomes newspeak – words can come to mean whatever the speaker says they mean.
The (poor) leader first may need to	Has a power drive that falls within the range of	Resists the self-promotion of the poor leader, so	Obeys the demands	Leadership ‘begins with the natural feeling that	The ideal follower should be able to distinguish between

assuage an unusual power drive or acquisition of material possessions (13)	the normal – although this is not specified.	refuses to be a follower.	of the poor leader.	one wants to serve, to serve first' (13). This is sharply different from one who is leader first, perhaps because of the need to assuage an unusual power drive or to acquire material possessions' (13). However, how the two are to be distinguished is unclear.	the leader who wishes to serve and the leader who wishes power and self-aggrandisement. The follower requires a certain sagacity, but the follower in this theory cannot possess such wisdom and insight, else s/he would be a servant leader.
	Ideal leaders seem to be paternalistic and domineering. Leaders know better than followers what they need to achieve: 'by clearly stating and restating the goal the leader gives certainty and purpose to others who may have difficulty in achieving it for themselves' (15)	Is child-like in his/her lack of certainty and purpose, requiring an external agent to provide what s/he lacks.	Would claim to know better than leaders what is needed.	Would appear to wear the mask of a servant, but this disguises an arrogance and certainty about his/her abilities, putting them beyond challenge. The servant leader has something of the tyrant about him/her.	Obeys orders.